Beshara Doumani's objective in Rediscovering Palestine is simple in concept but nuanced in execution. Seeking to write a history of Palestine that emphasizes the role of the masses over the elites and focuses on smaller towns and rural areas, the author argues that a study of the city of Nablus, explored primarily through the lens of local sources, is the best way to construct a history of ...

Beshara Doumani's Rediscovering Palestine contributes to this new scholarship by offering a well-documented interpretation of Palestine's history during increased European economic penetration and renewed Ottoman centralization. By writing "[Palestine's] inhabitants into the historical narrative," Doumani seeks to shift the debate over the history of Palestine away from both Zionist historiography (which has consistently portrayed Palestine as stagnant and barren) and Arab national ...

10. According to Cohen, an example for this strategy in northern Palestine was set by Paul Maashouk, who worked as consul for Britain and Holland in the port city of Acre (Palestine, p. 12). Cohen states that Maashouk was a Dutchman, but Bruce Masters persuasively argues that he was a local (Origins, p. 108, n. 78).

Rediscovering Palestine

Rediscovering Palestine is a very good book. It is readable, innovative and often original. It adds new information, reveals important sources, and explores them with a sober and critical eye.
